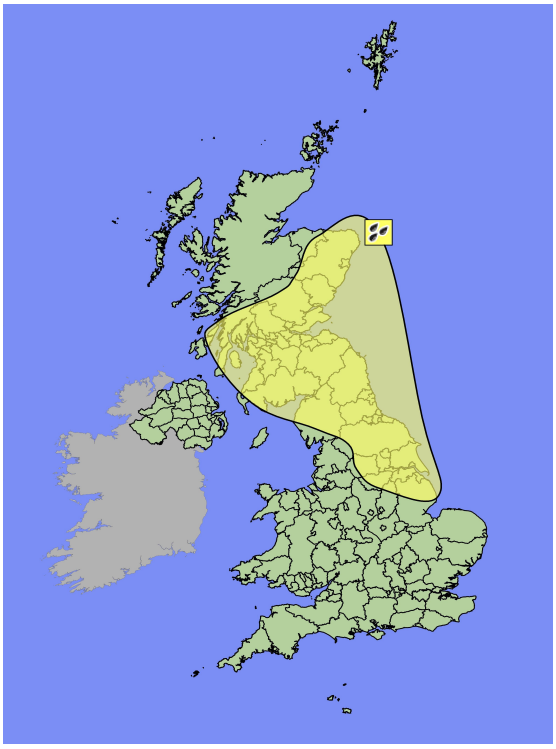
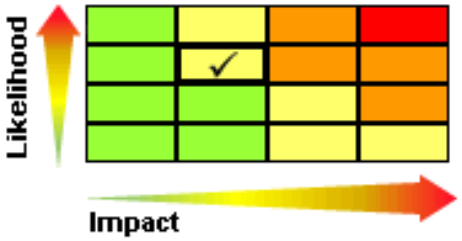
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A plume of warm humid air will extend north and west across many parts of northern Britain during Friday and Saturday and is likely to give some heavy and persistent rain. Through the two days some 20 to 40mm of rain is likely quite widely with perhaps as much as 60mm locally. At this range details of the areas likely to be worst affected remains uncertain and not all areas will be raining all of the time. We hope to firm up on the details as the week goes on so please watch for updates to this alert.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Alert of Rain

Valid from 00:05 on Fri, 06th Jul 2012 until 23:55 on Sat, 07th Jul 2012

Some heavy and persistent rain is likely to affect much of southern, eastern and central Scotland along with much of northern England at times during Friday and Saturday. Over parts of Northern England on Saturday in particular, the rain may be of a more showery, thundery nature. The public should be aware of the localised surface water flooding is likely and there is an increasing risk of some river flooding.
